'Living and working in London is awesome, and I love how close Europe is. Being a paramedic is challenging and QUT helped me get here. With real world courses and hands-on training - that made a real difference.' Daniel Pincus Watch video As well as clinical placement on the road, paramedic students get first-hand experience working alongside other emergency service providers to treat casualties in simulated trauma scenarios. Watch video When you study with us, you'll be working in real clinical settings and simulation environments from your first year. Explore our 360° environments and see what real-world health sciences can mean for you. 360 degrees of QUT QUT's Bachelor of Paramedic Science offers three six-week placements with the option to travel overseas in your third year. The domestic placements serve as long 'job interviews' and help you to build industry connections while working as part of an ambulance crew to cultivate and consolidate what you've learned in class. I gained experience with pre-hospital births, high-velocity trauma, and multi-system medical cases. In my final year I had the privilege of travelling to Washington, USA, for a three-week placement, where I experienced the emergency medical services system across various cities. I did ride-alongs with ambulance services, fire services, and even helicopter and fixed wing flight car services. Jodey Brand Paramedics work in diverse settings and often have to make quick decisions about patient care. If the owner of an assistance dog requires emergency help, a paramedic needs to understand the relationship between the dog and its owner. Representatives from Assistance Dogs Australia and Smart Pups visited QUT with their dogs so students could learn how to handle this complex situation. It's exciting, challenging, and you have to think quick on your feet, which I really enjoy. QUT was the first university to offer a degree in paramedics, and they have really strong ties with the Queensland Ambulance Service.'
